A Corpus-analytic investigation

Continuum of literal and loose uses

Part 2: 'Boiling'

Hypothesis

There is a gradient of cases constituting a continuum of literal and loose uses (approximation, hyperbole, metaphor) of the same word.

Strategy and Objectives

Our objective at this point is to continue investigating the main hypotheses raised in Part 1 ('painless'). Here, the chosen word is 'boiling' and the emphasis of our search will fall on the relative frequency of both its literal sense and its possible loose uses.

Findings

1. The lexical environment

All the occurrences of 'boiling' as a phrasal verb (boiling away, boiling down etc) as well as its occurrences in multiword lexical items will be eliminated from our search.

[initially I had eliminated 'boiling' as a phrasal verb only when used literally but this way I was favouring the frequency of metaphorical uses so I have now eliminated its occurrences as a phrasal verb in metaphorical utterances too]

4. General

All the findings in this section are in line with the hypotheses and findings of the first part of our search ('painless'). Note that the given word occurs with higher frequency in its loose senses. The frequency of interpretations in which either a literal or an approximate interpretation would be equally satisfactory constitute only 1/5 of all interpretations involving literal meaning.

4.1 Synecdoche

The classical rhetorical trope of synecdoche occurs relatively frequently, mainly due to expressions such as 'the boiling kettle' or 'the boiling pot'.

The partial overlap of the definition of synecdoche with metonymy and its being alien to the idiom of the project is definitely a problem. I feel it is important to clear up this matter before I proceed to a further search.

Since last week I have reconsidered a number of examples which in my first search I treated as literal. Examples such as:

2 cooking up chicken drumsticks, baking potatoes or boiling rice or pasta for salads. Sandwich fillings.

Initially I took such instances of 'boiling' as literal but then it occurred to me that what this string actually means is COOK RICE OR PASTA IN BOILING WATER. If all uses of 'boiling' as a transitive verb (where the object is not water or other boilable liquid) are to be interpreted in this way I think the correct line of interpretation is to treat them as cases of synecdoche/metonymy since it is not the rice or other object that is boiling but rather the water which contains it. What do you think?

4.2 Metaphor

The metaphorical uses of 'boiling' relate to the following contextual domains:

- [conceptual metaphors of] anger and emotional frustration,
- 19 ... The brothers, seemingly stable, are absolutely boiling inside with various frustrations...
- 236 Though Abasio and Arakny were boiling with impotent rage, Olly was silent and pale...
 - excessive heat,
- 18 ... This summer is promising to be long and boiling...
 - tension,
- 17 ... Cup final, against anyone Pakistan relations almost at boiling point?...

- and finally [kinaesthetic metaphors of motor activity relating to the] movement of water or clouds,
- 10 ...several small boats disappeared in boiling seas and winds of up to 154km/h off the southern...
- 233 ... tiles laid in swirling patterns as of flame or boiling cloud or the movement of blown leaves...

4.3 A few problems with the range of different water temperatures denoted by the strict expression 'boiling water'

The decision on whether 'boiling water' is used strictly or loosely calls upon encyclopaedic knowledge relating to the contexts in which the given word occurs.

In a recipe for pasta or making a poached egg for instance a receiver with relevant knowledge would take 'boiling' at face value. Here the term is certainly used strictly, since if the water is not really boiling the egg-white will spread in the water and the egg will not come out in one piece. But in other contexts it seems equally or more reasonable to take the term approximately or even hyperbolically: very hot -but not strictly speaking boiling water- for example is more than fine when blanching/ softening a wide range of vegetables, dissolving gelatine, stock cubes etc. I guess the reason why the strict term 'boiling' is used in those cases is because it appears safer than saying 'very hot water'; opinions as to what constitutes 'very hot water' might vary significantly but one cannot claim the same about 'boiling water'.

- 4 ...finely slice the well washed leek and blanch it in boiling water for 1 minute.
- 5 ... melt the powdered gelatine in 2-3 tablespoons boiling water.
- 67... cubes into a jug and make up to 600ml (1 pint) with boiling water. Stir well until the stock cubes are completely

As a result I have identified 34 examples in which either a literal or an approximate interpretation would be good enough. Whether a hearer will take the term in one sense or the other clearly depends on the pertinent knowledge she will bring to bear.

In other cases it seems a bit harder to sustain the literal interpretation:

- 23... a team of dedicated officers and helpers load urns of boiling water, bags of sandwiches, sometimes with cakes
- 37 ...cake with the icing, smoothing with a knife dipped in boiling water.

In 23 it is highly unlikely that the water in the urn is 100 $^{\circ}$ C hot. To fill the urn the water must be removed from the heat which would cause its temperature to drop. Then a further fall in temperature would be expected because of the heat escaping from the urn. The use of boiling here is either approximate or hyperbolic.

Example 37 refers to a common technique for preparing a knife before slicing or smoothing. But the water doesn't necessarily have to be 100 °C hot for such a purpose. It doesn't even have to be near 100 °C. If you bring this assumption to bear you are likely to interpret the term as either a rough approximation or a hyperbole. The same goes for example 75:

75... saffron mayonnaise. Cover the saffron with 15ml (1 tbsp) boiling water and leave to stand for 15min.

But, I was more concerned with some of the examples in which encyclopaedic knowledge dictates that 'boiling' could not have been used literally except by mistake.

48... vegetable oil / seasoning Clean the lentils in boiling water, then boil for a quarter of an hour until soft.

What would be the purpose of 'cleaning' the lentils in boiling rather than cold water? I don't have the answer myself and I am inclined to treat this example as a mistake.

Now take the following line which seems to refer to a method of gently heating sauces over very hot water (bain-marie)

321 ...For sauce, melt chocolate with syrup and water over boiling water, then beat until smooth. Pour over pudding.

There is one important way in which the use of the strict term here differs from that of the previous paragraph: in cases such as those described in the first 4 paragraphs, boiling the water all the way through would simply be a redundancy given that very hot water but not strictly speaking 'boiling' would also do the job. However, in ex. 321 and other cases the use of boiling water will not merely amount to redundancy of effort. Rather, literally boiling water would be way too hot for the given purpose as it would thicken the chocolate and make it taste bitter.

The same goes for other examples such as 7 that do not relate to cookery:

7 ...and chest. Add 10 drops of friar's balsam to 500ml boiling water and inhale fumes, then mop face with a cold

Boiling water is inadequately hot for inhaling purposes. The pot must always be removed from the heat before starting to inhale the fumes. But then it is not strictly speaking boiling any more, is it?

So, either the use of 'boiling' in these cases is a mistake or it must be taken in anything but its strict literal sense.

In overall, our sample reveals that the strict expression 'boiling water' is used for water temperatures that range from literally boiling (in making pasta) to approximately boiling (in blanching asparagus or making bain-marie) to hyperbolically boiling (when one claims that he drank his tea boiling hot).

4.4 What is the literal meaning of 'boiling' in everyday use?

How possible is it that the receiver of all literal or approximate utterances of 'boiling' will have a chart of boiling points for liquids and a thermometer in hand ready to submerge it in the allegedly boiling liquid? Are we thus right to say that in all informal / non laboratory-precision conditions 'boiling' simply means something intuitive and slightly loose along the lines of 'when a liquid starts to bubble'?
