Continuum of literal and loose uses

Part 3: 'raw'

Hypothesis

There is a gradient of cases constituting a continuum of literal and loose uses (approximation, hyperbole, metaphor) of the same word.

Strategy and Objectives

Our objective at this point is to continue investigating the main hypotheses raised in Part 1 ('painless'). Here, the chosen word is 'raw' and the emphasis of our search will fall on the relative frequency of both its literal sense and its possible loose uses.

Method

Concordance lines of 'raw' independently of collocation.

General

Just a quick follow up to the thoughts expressed in the Synopsis.

The findings of our investigation of 'raw' indeed seem to support all the initial theoretical hypotheses of the project and provide strong evidence for a pragmatic account of lexical interpretation.

Just as in the case of 'painless', parameters of historical change have complicated our search which began with a certain assumption about the literal meaning of 'raw' and ended up with another.

Hence, the following tables are based on Deirdre's proposal that 'raw' in English (unlike Latinogenic languages such as Spanish and French) seems to have taken on a broader literal sense, that of NOT PROCESSED.

During my tutorial this week I had the chance to briefly discuss 'raw' with Deirdre and we both agreed that the lack of hyperbolic instances of 'raw' is down to the very limited contexts in which 'raw' would be expected to be used hyperbolically (namely, contexts of complaint). The representability of such contexts in the corpus is extremely low (just one occurrence in ex. 82, Ukspoken).

However, Deirdre raised a more general theoretical issue that we might want to take into account in the future: more specifically, the restricted distribution of approximation and hyperbole and the parameters which control it.

The following statistical table is subject to revision. As Rosa teasingly recognized 'there is something wrong with my arithmetic' and it would be great if (after she submits) we could go through all the counts together to make sure that I haven't got the numbers completely wrong. [NB the correct (revised) figures are given in the table below]
